London, United Kingdom (July 21, 2010) - Ecospace, a London based architectural company, offer an affordable solution for the housing problems in the UK by introducing the modular home to many gardens.

Ecospace understand that the current economic climate can be worrying, and it appears everyone is trying to find a way to cut back on expenditure. Building housing or having an extension built on to a current home can be costly; however there is one alternative that is ideal for those cutting back on costs but wanting to maintain the high quality they'd expect elsewhere, and that is to purchase an aesthetically pleasing modular building that can be installed in the garden. These fashionable homes can be used as additional living or office space so that costly home moving becomes unnecessary.

Ecospace contemporary and sustainable housing fulfils all the requirements of a modern home and they can provide bespoke services so every client receives the extra space of their dreams. Ecospace modular housing is designed to be environmentally friendly, so not only will a client have a beautiful new personal or professional office quarters but they will be helping to ensure the future of the planet.

A spokesperson for Ecospace commented: "There is a housing shortage here in the UK; therefore it is harder to find a new home with adequate living space. Many people are now considering having extensions added to their homes but with the current economic situation, they may struggle to find the funds. However, when purchasing a modular building with us here at Ecospace, we can provide them with a contemporary home that not only makes financial sense but is also good for the environment. Our bespoke services ensure our clients receive the suitable housing that will complement their homes, and with fully qualified architects and engineers on board, our clients can rest assure that they will be provided with an attractive addition that is sure to fulfil their requirements".
