Philadelphia, PA – February 2, 2007– Today, Presidential Candidate Daniel J. Imperato arrived today in Philadelphia as part of his national campaign tour.

Imperato will be meeting with area business leaders, local media, and local citizens to rally support for his White House campaign.

"The people of Philadelphia are hard working people, who believe in the American economy and American jobs. My job is to help bring back some of the faith in our economy for our working class people," stated Imperato.

Imperato was most recently in Washington DC, where he met with key members of organized labor.

Organized labor is a group that has consistently shown the need for a third party, but has instead thrown scattered support to various groups including the Democratic Party and Ralph Nader of the Green Party, both of which have not advanced the cause of labor.

Due to mishaps within the labor party and the rise of Political Action Committees (PAC's), organized labor has yet to realize a unifying third party that could win the majority of the electorate.

"The need for a third option in America is real. However, we haven't had one that is able to win. We need a third candidate that American can believe in and vote for. I believe that the Independent Party is that option and I believe that I am the candidate that can show America that an independent can win the majority of the vote," stated Imperato.

Imperato felt that he understands the position of everyday Americans who have to struggle and work harder to make less.

"I invite the out-of-touch politicians to walk a mile in the shoes of the hard working people of Philadelphia, and of the hard working people across this country. The fact is I come from a very humble background and I've walked in the shoes of everyday Americans, and I'm proud of it. In 2008, I am going to keep walking in those shoes, for every man, woman, and child in America, all the way to the White House."
