Washington DC (i1Connect News) – Daniel Imperato revisited a campaign promise today, to open communications and improve relations with Cuba. As the leading Independent candidate for President, Imperato – who has extensive world business and strategic experience – repeated his 2005 prediction that if the United States didn't take action with Cuba, someone else will. Back in June of 2007, Imperato called for an immediate meeting with Fidel Castro, once it was announced that he had returned to good health.

“Helping Cuba become an economic force in the region will go a long way toward freeing the Cuban people from bondage and unfair living conditions. Forty years of American administrations have been neglecting one of our important strategic security points – the Caribbean sea lanes and the opportunity for trade with Cuba. The Caribbean and Cuba have become investment hubs for foreign nations around the globe, which could very well jeopardize our security,” contended Imperato.

"If we do not address the Cuban situation with Castro, Hugo Chavez will. The Chinese will. They have already loaned millions to Cuba and have offered to protect their oil and gas shipping lanes. We can't lose this opportunity for freedom with one of our closest neighbors."

In August 2006, shortly after declaring that the United States had a duty and obligation to support democracy, Miami based Cuban-American community leader Art Alvarez endorsed Daniel Imperato for the White House.

"Cuba could be a very important ally and a great friend to our nation if we would reach out to them," summarized Imperato.
