Tutors International announces that they are in talks with NUVHS, providers of premier quality online high school tuition to home-schooled students. The aim of the talks is to form a future collaboration between the two organizations, as both are specialists in the provision of home education. NUVHS is accredited by the NCAA, CITA, an alliance of the largest American accrediting associations, and also by WASC, whose accreditation is only given the best secondary schools. Home-schooled students can study with NUVHS with flexibility that is impossible to provide in the standard high school system. Adam Caller, founder of Tutors International, commented on the potential collaboration. "The talks are in the early stages but both parties are confident that the combination of our world-class tutors and the excellent online education provision from NUVHS would be very beneficial to the students. This is at the center of our desire for collaboration."

Adam continued; "Tutors International specializes in finding the best quality tutors able to provide bespoke education tailored to a wide variety of student needs. Often the tutors are recruited on a full time basis and live with the family. This blends perfectly with the NUVHS system; having the tutor there in the home with the student would reassure parents in particular that their child is working as hard and efficiently as possible. Our tutors are experts in helping children reach their full academic potential," Adam enthused. "We are confident that our tutors would add incredibly valuable support to any home-schooling student studying for university via the excellent NUVHS online system."
